Extremism takes many forms. At its worst, it encourages and actively supports violence of the kind seen in America on 9/11 and in London on the July 7th bombings in 2005. After these and other incidents, many blamed Islamic extremists and asked whether Muslim communities around the world had done all they could to prevent such attacks. Others insisted the real fault lay with Western policies, particularly towards Israel and Iraq. So tonight we debate this highly controversial issue with the motion, This House believes that Muslims are failing to combat extremism and we have some influential voices on our panel:
